TEACHING

COURSES TAUGHT

Lower Division:

Introduction to Human Communication: Introduces students to basic concepts from various areas of study within the communication discipline, including perception, listening, language, nonverbal communication, intercultural communication, interpersonal communication, organizational communication, and public speaking. Taught as a large lecture course (approximately 450 students per section).

Public Speaking*: General education course that focuses on developing student skill and confidence in public speaking situations. Students learn how to research a speech topic, organize their main points, speak extemporaneously, and give planned speeches.

Advanced Public Speaking: Focuses on polishing skills learned in the basic public speaking course as well as developing new competencies. Students typically give five different speeches, including an informative or demonstrative speech, a persuasive speech, a speech to entertain, an oral interpretation, and either a dramatic duo or reader's theater. Impromptu speaking is also emphasized.

Introduction to Interpersonal Communication*: Introduces students to basic concepts in interpersonal communication, including self-disclosure, relational stages, emotion, nonverbal messages, interaction within organizations and families, and so forth. This course includes several student workshops that help students build their skills as competent communicators.

Introduction to Nonverbal Communication: Introduces students to the basic codes that comprise nonverbal communication, including kinesics, proxemics, haptics, chronemics, appearances, olfactics, vocalics, and the environment. This is a beginning course that focuses on experiential learning and application. Students conduct mini-experiments and participate in nonverbal workshops.

* Also served as director/course coordinator for these courses.

Upper Division:

Advanced Research Methods in Communication: Examines empirical research methods, including experimental research design, observational methods, and questionnaire construction. Teaches students how to conduct and report their own research. Introduces students to basic statistics.

Conflict, Negotiation and Communication: Focuses on conflict across both professional and interpersonal contexts. Course is divided into three sections: (1) foundations of conflict and negotiation, (2) interpersonal conflict, and (3) negotiation in professional contexts. This course is required for business majors with a communication concentration.

Relational Communication: Course content is focused on defining and understanding basic communication processes that occur within the context of close relationships, such as those between friends, family members, and romantic partners. Course content is multidisciplinary, although the emphasis is on communication. The course is divided into three broad sections: (1) attraction, love, and relationship development, (2) maintaining happy relationships, and (3) coping with relational challenges.

Nonverbal Communication: Examines the codes and functions of nonverbal communication. The codes include kinesics, appearance, proxemics, haptics, vocalics, environmental features, chronemics, and olfactics. The functions include forming and managing impressions, expressing emotion, structuring and managing interaction, defining and managing relationships, influencing others, and deceiving others.

Persuasion: An advanced course designed to introduce students to theory and research on social influence processes, including attitude change, reinforcement, social learning, group decision making, compliance gaining, advertising, and propaganda. Students are required to give a persuasive presentation, write a paper reviewing literature on a particular topic area, and work with a group on an advertising campaign.

Interpersonal Communication Theory: Advanced course that provides a survey of major research topics, paradigms, and theories in interpersonal communication. Requires students to read and analyze journal articles from a wide variety of areas within the field of interpersonal communication. Topics include sections on initial interaction, general interpersonal processes, nonverbal messages, and strategic communication.

Graduate Courses:

Research Methods in Communication: Master's level course that introduces students to a variety of research methods, such as interviewing, ethnography, narratives, rhetorical criticism, survey design, and experimental research. Students are required to write two research proposals on the same topic, with one proposal addressing the issue using qualitative methods, and the other addressing the same or similar question using quantitative methods.

Quantitative Research Methods: Graduate-level course for master's students and beginning Ph.D. students. Covers various common research methods that employ quantitative data analysis, including survey methods, naturalistic observation, and experimental studies. Introduces students to the logic behind inferential statistics, as well as descriptive statistics such as mean, standard deviation, variance, and z-scores. Basic statistical techniques, such as correlation, regression, t-test, and analysis of variance are covered, with a focus on both the mathematical properties and the practical applications of these statistics. Students complete several computer assignments, take exams, and write a research proposal.

Multivariate Statistics and Data Analysis in Communication: Doctoral-level course that covers many of the statistical techniques commonly used in quantitative communication research, including univariate and multivariate analysis of variance, analysis of covariance, repeated-measures and mixed model designs, and various types of regression models. The course focuses on helping students (a) understand the basic mathematical procedures and logical reasoning behind the use of various statistical methods, (b) determine when it is (and is not) appropriate to use different types of statistical methods, and (c) know how to run, interpret, and report statistical analyses.

Seminar on Relational Communication: Doctoral-level courses focusing on interdisciplinary research on social and personal relationships, including romantic relationships and friendships. Covers topics such as identity, attraction, uncertainty and secret tests, relationship initiation and development, love, attachment, communication about sex, hook-up culture, relationship maintenance, transgressions, jealousy, hurtful communication, forgiveness, breakups, on-again off-again relationships, and relationship repair.

Seminar on Communication and Emotion: Advanced graduate seminar in communication and emotion. Explores how emotions function in different kinds of relationships and contexts, how individuals communicate emotions to others, and how individuals react to the emotional expressions of others. The course focuses on the trends and controversies in the growing research area of communication and emotion. Students examine general theories of emotion and emotional expression, as well as research on specific emotions (e.g., anger, jealousy, love) and on emotion within particular contexts (e.g., persuasion, deception, cross-cultural interaction).

Seminar on Nonverbal Communication: A graduate-level seminar that examines the functions nonverbal communication fulfills in everyday life, as well as the role nonverbal messages play in various communication and psychology theories. In particular, theories of nonverbal adaptation, which focus on patterns of accommodation, reciprocity, compensation, and the like, are discussed. In addition to writing two position papers and creating a teaching tool, students are required to conduct an original study that is suitable for publication or presentation at a conference.

Seminar on Interpersonal Communication Theory: A graduate-level seminar that surveys some of the leading theories on interpersonal communication, including theories on uncertainty, dialectics, privacy management, facework, identity, nonverbal immediacy, deception, and social information processing, among others. Students learn to think critically about the links between research and theory and gain a better understanding of how scholars develop programs of research. Major assignments involve writing article and theory critiques and profiling a prolific scholar in interpersonal communication.

Seminar on the “Dark Side” of Interpersonal Communication: A graduate-level seminar that surveys the literature related to problematic (or potentially problematic) communication in relationships. Topics include social predicaments, conflict, uncertainty, misunderstanding, jealousy, infidelity, unrequited love, fatal attraction, sexual harassment, hurtful messages, anger, obsessive relational intrusion, and relationship disengagement. The course ends by examining the literature on forgiveness and remedial strategies. The major assignment involves conducting an original research project related to the dark side of interpersonal communication.

Method Module on Dyadic Data Analysis: A graduate-level one-unit module examining selected methods for analyzing dyadic data using statistical techniques such as repeated measures designs, multi-level modeling, and structural equation modeling. This module is hands-on, with graduate students gaining experience analyzing and writing up results from actual data sets.

RECOGNITION FOR TEACHING

Mentoring Award, 2007, Barrett’s Honors College, Arizona State University.

Finalist, Last Lecture Series, 2004, Arizona State University, Student-Teacher Organization (student nominated)
